Yes, the phrase is mine and I don't like him plagiarizing it. I have used it for a long time. I can't remember having read it anywhere or ever having heard anyone use it before. I probably invented it and, for a reason that appears to have escaped Mr. Martin's understanding. It is that the myriad of strategems, deceptions, artifices and all the other devices of disinformation which the Soviet bloc and its coordinated intelligence services use to confuse and split the West have confronted our policy makers with an ever-fluid landscape where fact and illusion merge -- a kind of wilderness of mirrors where honest statesmen are finding it increasingly difficult to separate the facts of Soviet actions from the illusion of Soviet rhetoric.
