

Evidence connecting Bart van Alphen to @the_dr_caveman:

Striking similarities in tweets between @the_dr_caveman and Bart van Alphen's personal account were first presented publicly on October 20, 2020. These include numerous references by @the_dr_caveman to being a neuroscientist "behind enemy lines" in the Evanston/Chicago area, with expertise in circadian biology. We believe that the evidence presented strongly suggests that the @the_dr_caveman account is run by Bart van Alphen.

6. The image of protestors posted by @the_dr_caveman appears to be taken from The Park Evanston, a high-rise apartment building in downtown Evanston. In 2018, Bart van Alphen's account included a screenshot of a receipt from The Park Evanston.

Yeah I reached the same conclusion. I'm not religious but our Christian roots should be cherished. Islam is the threat

#IntroduceYourself

Chicago based neuroscientist, closeted Trump supporter as coming out would kill my career.

Very happy to have found #gab so I no longer have to suffer from the whims of reddit/twatter/facebook mods who are labeling right wing opinions haram.

Thanks @a

Very true. I work in academia and part of the challenge is to train Asians from a rote learning culture into creative, effective scientists. Maybe 10% is capable of that. The other 90% are only good to use as technicians. They lack the spark to take risks and be wrong. They'll always stay on the safest path

Note that the first quote in his profile is apparently popular amongst white nationalists, as the same quote was used by someone who stormed the capitol:

This "Dr Caveman" Blogger account is a frequent commenter on the blog of "Vox Day", a fascist blogger. This is one such comment: ("RaHoWa" means "Racial Holy War" and was coined by a white supremacist cult.)

Importantly, this "Dr Caveman" Blogger account has continued to post comments on Vox Day's blog after The_Dr_Caveman Twitter account was protected. This is the most recent post I could find, expressing enthusiasm about Trump possibly pulling off a military coup:

Molecular Genetics of Sleep and Circadian Rhythms

Our research is focused on the circadian regulation of sleep behavior using the fruit fly Drosophila and incorporates a variety of approaches including biochemistry, molecular biology, genetics, cell culture, electrophysiology, anatomy, and behavior.

Fly genetics has uncovered the molecular logic of circadian clocks. They consist of clock proteins that feed back and control their own transcription. Remarkably, highly conserved clocks exist in humans. We are interested in how these molecular networks develop. How does phosphorylation set the speed of the clock? How do these feedback loops influence neuronal activity and output?

Astonishingly, fruit flies exhibit periods of inactivity with many of the cardinal features of mammalian sleep, including homeostatic control and similar responses to drugs such as caffeine. We have identified a fly sleep center in a region of the brain also important in long-term memory known as the mushroom bodies (MB). We are interested in understanding how the circadian clock and sleep loss influence the MB, how the MB influence sleep, and what are the links between sleep and learning? Studies in the fly raise the possibility of understanding the elusive function of sleep at the molecular level.

Neurodegeneration and the Circadian Clock

Disruption of daily rhythms has wide-ranging health consequences. We have begun to explore the links between the circadian clock and neurodegeneration. Human neurodegenerative disease such as Alzheimer's, ALS, and Huntington's disease frequently involves symptoms of circadian disruption. Remarkably, normalization of circadian rhythms and sleep cycles can stave off the progression of disease. We are using fruit fly models of human neurodegenerative disease to test the hypothesis that normal circadian function can protect against neurodegenerative decline, and to discover the genetic bases of these links in hopes of providing novel pharmaceutical targets and protective strategies.

Undergraduates interested in research experience in the Allada lab may contact Dr. Bart van Alphen at bart.alphen@northwestern.edu.

Above screenshot was taken 1/13/2021. Ravi Allada was informed about this incident in OCTOBER 2020 but still requires undergraduates to contact Bart if they want to work in the lab. Undergraduates across Northwestern are aware of this situation.
