I. INTEREST OF *AMICI CURIAE*¹

The individual amici whose views are presented here are international law scholars specializing in public international law and international human rights law. They include members of the International Human Rights Committee of the International Law Association, American Branch, and the Human Rights Interest Group of the American Society of International Law,² as well as university professors and practicing lawyers with expertise in these subjects. Amici also include nongovernmental organizations with expertise in civil rights law, immigration law, or international human rights law. Amici submit this brief to vindicate the public interest in ensuring a proper understanding and application of the international human rights law relevant to this case. The nongovernmental organizations and individual scholars are listed in the Appendix.

II. INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this brief is to bring to the Court's attention U.S. treaty provisions and customary international law principles that bear on the legality of Executive Order 13780 of March 6, 2017 ("EO"), which replaces the now-rescinded EO dated January 27, 2017.

International law, which includes treaties ratified by the United States as well as customary international law, is part of U.S. law and must be faithfully executed by the President and enforced by U.S. courts except when clearly inconsistent with the U.S. Constitution or subsequent acts of Congress. The United States is a party to and bound by several international human rights treaties relevant to the subject matter of the EO. In assessing the legality of the EO, the Court should be cognizant of those treaty obligations, and of customary international law, which should influence constructions of the U.S. Constitution and statutes that prohibit discrimination based on religion or national origin.

In addition, the Immigration and Nationality Act and other statutes must be read in harmony with these international legal obligations pursuant to the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution and long established principles of statutory construction requiring acts of Congress to be interpreted in a manner consistent with international law, whenever such a construction is reasonably possible. In this case, the international law obligations described below reinforce interpretations of those statutes forbidding discrimination of the type threatened by Sections 2 and 11 of the EO.

III. ARGUMENT

A. International Law Is Relevant to Assessing the Legality of the Executive Order.

International law is relevant to this case because the U.S. Constitution makes treaties part of U.S. law. Customary international law is also part of U.S. law and is enforceable by U.S. courts. Under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, “treaties made . . . under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and judges of every state shall be bound thereby.”³ Although the Constitution does not require legislation prior to treaties taking legal effect, the Supreme Court distinguishes between self-executing and non-self-executing treaties.⁴ The Senate or the President have declared that the relevant human rights treaties to

1 which the United States is a party are non-self-executing.⁵ Nevertheless, by ratifying those 2 treaties, the United States bound itself to provide judicial or other remedies for violations of 3 treaty obligations.⁶ Thus, even if the treaty provisions themselves are not directly enforceable in 4 U.S. courts, the rights they grant should be protected by courts through their interpretation of 5 constitutional provisions and statutes addressing the same or similar subject matter.

7 This is consistent with the positions taken by both the Executive Branch and Congress in 8 those cases in which Congress has not passed implementing legislation.⁷ When submitting
 9 human rights treaties to the Senate for its advice and consent, both Presidents George H.W. Bush
 10 and William Clinton assured the Senate that the United States could and would fulfill its treaty
 11 commitments by applying existing federal constitutional and statutory law.⁸ Courts generally 12 construe federal constitutional and statutory law to be consistent with human rights treaties in 13 part because the Senate has relied on such assurances as a basis for its consent to ratification.⁹
 14 The United States acknowledged this principle in its comments to the U.N. Committee Against 20 ⁷ See, e.g., U.N. Doc. CAT/C/28/Add.5, paras. 58-60 (“Where domestic law already makes adequate provision for the requirements of the treaty and is sufficient to enable the United States to meet its international obligations, the United States does not generally believe it necessary to adopt implementing legislation.”).

21 ⁸ During Senate hearings on the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“CAT”), June 26, 1987, 1465 U.N.T.S. 113, the State Department Legal Advisor told the 22 Senate: “Any public official in the United States, at any level of government, who inflicts torture . . . would be subject to an effective system of control and punishment in the U.S. legal system.” Hearing Before the Comm. on 23 Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 101st Cong. (1990), at 8.

24 Similarly, with respect to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (“CERD”), Dec. 21, 1965, G.A. Res. 2106 (XX), Annex, 660 U.N.T.S. 195, the Clinton Administration told the Senate: “As was the case with the prior treaties, existing U.S. law provides extensive 25 protections and remedies sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the present Convention.” Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, Report on International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, S.
 26 Exec. Rep. No. 103-29, at 25-26 (1994).

⁹ See, e.g., Immigration & Naturalization Serv. v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 426 (1984).

1 Torture: “Even where a treaty is ‘non-self-executing,’ courts may nonetheless take notice of the 2 obligations of the United States thereunder in an appropriate case and may refer to the principles
 3 and objectives thereof, as well as to the stated policy reasons for ratification.”¹⁰ “Taking notice”
 4 of treaty obligations comports with a core principle of statutory construction announced by the 5 Supreme Court in Murray v. The Charming Betsy: “[A]n act of Congress ought never to be 6 construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains.”¹¹ That
 7 doctrine has been consistently and recently reaffirmed by the Supreme Court.¹²

 9 Moreover, in Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit
 10 observed that a treaty that is not self-executing may provide evidence of customary international 11 law.¹³ Customary international law must be enforced in U.S. courts even in the absence of 12 implementing legislation, regardless of whether customary rules appear in a treaty.¹⁴ In The 13 Paquete Habana, the Supreme Court held that customary international law “is part of our law”
 14 and directly enforceable in courts when no conflicting treaty, legislative act, or judicial decision
 15 controls.¹⁵ As discussed below, several human rights treaty rules applicable in this case are also 16 customary international law.
 17

18 The President is also obligated to respect international law pursuant to his constitutional 19 duty faithfully to execute the law.¹⁶ Because Article VI of the Constitution makes treaties the supreme law of the land, the President is constitutionally required to comply with U.S. treaty obligations as well as with customary international law. This was the intent of the Framers.¹⁷ Courts therefore have a duty to restrain federal executive action that conflicts with a duly ratified treaty. As the Supreme Court wrote in ordering the President to restore a French merchant ship to its owner pursuant to a treaty obligation: “The constitution of the United States declares a treaty to be the supreme law of the land. Of consequence its obligation on the courts of the United States must be admitted.”¹⁸

Even if the President were not directly bound by international law, however, he is still obligated to comply with the Constitution itself and all applicable legislation enacted by Congress within its authority, which (as noted) must be interpreted in a manner consistent with international law whenever possible.

The following sections identify the treaties and customary international law relevant to the legality of the EO.

B. International Law Regarding Discrimination on the Basis of Religion and National Origin

1. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

Discrimination based on religion or national origin is prohibited by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (“CCPR”). The United States ratified the CCPR in 1992.¹⁹

Article 2 of the CCPR states in relevant part:

1. Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights

1 recognized in the present Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as 2 race, . . . religion, . . . national or social origin, . . . or other status.

3 3. Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes:

4 (a) To ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are 5 violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has 6 been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;

7 (b) To ensure that any person claiming such a remedy shall have his right thereto
 8 determined by competent judicial, administrative or legislative authorities, or 9 by any other competent authority provided for by the legal system of the State,
 10 and to develop the possibilities of judicial remedy;

11 (c) To ensure that the competent authorities shall enforce such remedies when 12 granted.

13 The United Nations Human Rights Committee (“HRC”) is charged by the CCPR to 14 monitor implementation by state parties and to issue guidance on its proper interpretation. The 15 HRC interprets article 2 to prohibit “any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference” based 16 on a prohibited ground, and which has “the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the 17 recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing.”²⁰ To justify a derogation
 18 from the nondiscrimination (or any other human rights) duty, a measure must pursue a legitimate 19 aim and be proportionate to that aim.²¹ A “proportionate” measure is one effective at achieving 20 the aim and narrowly tailored (or “necessary”) to it.²²

21 The substantive rights guaranteed by the CCPR, which must be protected without 22 discrimination based on religion or national origin under article 2, include the protection of the 23 family. Article 23 provides in relevant part: “The family is the natural and fundamental group of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.”²³ The HRC has interpreted this right to include living together, which in turn obligates the state to adopt appropriate measures “to ensure the unity or reunification of families, particularly when their members are separated for political, economic or similar reasons.”²⁴

Restrictions on travel and entry caused by the EO that impose disparate and unreasonable burdens on the exercise of this right violate CCPR article 2. The HRC has explained that, although the CCPR does not generally recognize a right of aliens to enter or reside in the territory of a State party . . . , in certain circumstances an alien may enjoy the protection of the Covenant even in relation to entry or residence, for example, when considerations of non-discrimination, prohibition of inhuman treatment and respect for family life arise.²⁵

Thus, the right of entry is not beyond the scope of the CCPR. On the contrary, the CCPR’s nondiscrimination principles and protections for family life should be considered by courts in interpreting government measures affecting family unification. This treaty-based protection for family life is consistent with Supreme Court jurisprudence respecting the role of due process of law in governmental decisions affecting family unity.²⁶

More generally, article 26 of the CCPR prohibits discrimination in any government measure, regardless of whether the measure violates a Covenant right:

All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

As interpreted by the HRC and consistent with its wording, this provision “prohibits discrimination in law or fact in any field regulated” by the government.²⁷ Notably, unlike CCPR article 2, the equal protection provisions of CCPR article 26 lack article 2’s limitation to “all individuals within [the state party’s] territory and subject to its jurisdiction.”

The nondiscrimination provisions of the CCPR are also customary international law binding on the United States, forming part of U.S. law unless contrary to the Constitution or a statute. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which the United States approved in 1948, mandates nondiscrimination in religion and national origin, equal protection of the law, and protection from arbitrary interference in family life.²⁸ The American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, which the United States approved when it signed and ratified the Charter of the Organization of American States the same year, has similar provisions in articles 6 and 17.²⁹ These nondiscrimination principles and the right to family unity have become sufficiently widespread and accepted by the international community that they have entered into customary international law in the present day.³⁰

2. The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination

The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (“CERD”) also bars discrimination based on national origin. The United States has been a party

1 to the CERD since 1994.³¹ Under article 2, paragraph (1)(a), each state party commits to 2 refraining from and prohibiting all forms of racial discrimination, and each further undertakes “to 3 engage in no act or practice of racial discrimination . . . and to ensure that all public authorities
 4 and public institutions, national or local, shall act in conformity with this obligation.” CERD
 5 defines “racial discrimination” to include distinctions and restrictions based on national origin.³²
 6 With regard to immigration practices, CERD makes clear that states are free to adopt only such 7 “nationality, citizenship or naturalization” policies that “do not discriminate against any 8 particular nationality.”³³ Like the nondiscrimination provisions of CCPR article 26, CERD
 9 article 2 does not limit its application to citizens or resident noncitizens. While CERD does not 10 speak specifically to restrictions on entry of nonresident aliens, the general language of CERD
 11 expresses a clear intention to eliminate discrimination based on race or national origin from all 12 areas of government activity: “States Parties undertake to prohibit and to eliminate racial 13 discrimination in all its forms . . . without distinction as to race, colour, or national or ethnic 14 origin”³⁴

17 Article 4 of CERD further provides that state parties “[s]hall not permit public authorities 18 or public institutions, national or local, to promote or incite racial discrimination,” which (as 19 noted) includes discrimination based on national origin. The Committee on the Elimination of 20 Racial Discrimination, the body of independent experts appointed to monitor CERD’s 21 implementation, interprets article 4 to require states to combat speech stigmatizing or

1 stereotyping non-citizens generally, immigrants, refugees, and asylum seekers,³⁵ with statements
 2 by high-ranking officials causing “particular concern.”³⁶ In TBB-Turkish Union in 3 Berlin/Brandenburg v. Germany, for example, the Committee specifically determined that 4 Germany violated the Convention when it failed to discipline or punish a minor government
 5 official who had inter alia drawn attention to low employment rates of Turkish and Arab 6 populations in Germany, suggested their unwillingness to integrate into German society, and 7 proposed that their immigration should be discouraged.³⁷ These statements, the Committee
 8 determined, implied “generalized negative characteristics of the Turkish population” and incited
 9 racial discrimination.³⁸

11 The legality of the EO in this case, and the proper interpretation of the statutes and 12 constitutional provisions cited by the parties, should be assessed with those proscriptions in 13 mind. Those international law principles require courts to reject any attempt by the President to 14 define classes based on national origin or religion, and then to impose on those classes disparate 15 treatment, except to the extent necessary to achieve a legitimate government purpose.

17 C. Relevant Provisions of the Executive Order

18 Section 2 categorically suspends immigration from six specified countries—Iran, Libya, 19 Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen, and imposes special requirements on immigrants from Iraq.
 20 Section 2(a), moreover, authorizes the Secretary of Homeland Security to demand “certain 21 information” from “particular countries even if it is not needed from every country.”

1 The EO thus makes an explicit distinction based on national origin that, unless necessary
 2 and narrowly tailored to achieve a legitimate government aim, would violate U.S. obligations
 3 under international law. In effect, the EO also makes a distinction based on religion, as plaintiffs 4 have argued. Notably, every one of the designated countries has a population that is 5 overwhelmingly Muslim,³⁹ and the EO does not suspend immigration from any state with a non-6 Muslim majority, including some countries identified by the United States as state sponsors of 7 terrorism.

9 International law is also relevant to Section 11 of the EO, which requires the Secretary of 10 Homeland Security to “collect and make publicly available” certain information relating inter
 11 alia to convictions of terrorism-related offenses, government charges of terrorism, and “gender-12 based violence against women” by foreign nationals. The EO requires no publication of similar 13 information relating to U.S. nationals. By mandating that the Secretary publish pejorative
 14 information about noncitizens without publishing comparable information about U.S. citizens, 15 Section 11 makes a suspect distinction based on national origin. While Section 11 has not been 16 challenged specifically by the plaintiffs, it may bear on the intent to discriminate, because the 17 decision to publish derogatory information about noncitizens alone is stigmatizing, and appears 18 to be motivated by a desire to characterize noncitizens as more prone to terrorism or gender-
 19 based violence than U.S. citizens. Apart from what it may indicate with respect to intent, a 20 measure designed to stigmatize noncitizens cannot be proportionate and thus violates article 26
 21 of the CCPR and articles 2 and 4 of the CERD.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, amici request that the Court consider U.S. obligations under international law, which forms part of U.S. law, in evaluating the legality of the EO.

RESPECTFULLY SUBMITTED this 13th day of March, 2017.
